"My drama class at Oxford taught me the foundations of so many techniques of acting and completely redefined my knowledge and enjoyment of Shakespeare, leading me only further into the world of performing and writing. My Creative Writing class in Spain strengthened my storytelling abilities in both prose and poetry and inspired me to continue forth in those as well as expand into plays and screenplays. I also attribute Oxbridge with my comfort living away from home and making new friends as well as taking advantage of every opportunity college (and life) presents. The idea that "Life could be like this" inspires me daily'. Academia de España and Oxford Tradition attendee, now at NYU.

"I see a strong connection between my Oxbridge experience and college. I used my interest in Journalism to help build a strong resume for college, and the program definitely helped me do that. Not only was I accepted to my dream school, I was also invited to participate their first year of the "Fast Track Journalism Program" where they allow freshman to begin classes in the JOMC school two or three years early based on their journalism experience in high school. I have nothing but good things to say about my Oxbridge experience – It opened so many doors!" Oxford Tradition attendee, now at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

"My Creative Writing class at Cambridge was the first time I had a class that allowed me to focus on my poetry. I was greatly encouraged by our instructor, Michael Sofranko, and went on to win many national and high school awards for my writing including the Howard Nemerov Award from Washington University in St. Louis and Karolyn Kizer award from the Seattle Review. I was selected by the English Department at my high school to attend The Breadloaf Young Writers conference, and I went to University of Iowa's summer writing institute as well as the New York State Young Writers Institute. This all started in Cambridge." Cambridge Tradition attendee, now at the University of Pennsylvania.

"My dream of becoming a pediatric neurologist was unbelievably fostered by my professors at CamTrad. I am still in contact with one of them who keeps me up-to-date with the happenings in the medical world from his point of view. As far as helping me in college, I took a course entitled biopsychology this past semester and was one of only two to receive an 'A' in the course. I absolutely attribute my success in that course (as well as my success in my major) to the knowledge I gained from Medicine and the Brain. Additionally, I realized through CamTrad that the most important part of college is not what information I gained in the classroom but rather the relationships I foster with those around me." Cambridge Tradition attendee, now at Hastings College.
